BIG NAMES GONE GREEN! Various designers have created capsule eco-collections in recent years, and this season, two seriously major lines are getting in on the act. DKNY's Pure collection of easy-sexy, throw-on slipdresses, wrap sweaters, and slouchy trousers is rendered in black-and-white organic cotton, linen, and recycled nylon. Banana Republic's new Heritage for Women line is 90 percent environmentally sustainable, using bamboo fabrics, recycled packaging, and a clean-water denim finishing process—and the clothes, from silk button-downs and embroidered maxi dresses to ankle-cropped jeans, have the perfect laid-back polish.

▼ CAN LEATHER BE ECO-FRIENDLY?

The question raged in the Lucky offices, and the answer, as it turns out, is yes. Some of our favorite shoe and bag lines, like Swedish Has-Beens, are working with the burgeoning organic-leather industry, which relies on farm-raised, organically fed animals and nontoxic plant and vegetable tanning. Another option is recycled leather, in which designers use leather sourced from vintage pieces that gets cleaned, dyed, polished, and whipped up into something brand-new—but not.
